

Some of the Southern Democrats have behaved better during the whole of the Presidential contest in the House of Representatives than John Young Brown, Milton J. Durham, and Henry Watterson of Kentucky to-day. In the midst of the greatest confusion to-day, Mr. Brown, standing in the aisle by his seat, denounced the rowdy element in the House which was disgracing the name of the American Congress in unmeasured terms. He told them to their faces that it was the duty of the officers of the House to make them behave themselves. When a demand was made that strangers, of whom several hundred had been admitted, should be turned out the floor and out of the cloak-room, Mr. Brown exclaimed "that the confusion was due to the behavior of members themselves." "The people in the galleries," he said, "would be ashamed to behave as members of Congress were doing." Mr. Glover of Missouri, one of the Democrats who has universally voted with the filibusters, also denounced the disgraceful proceedings in the strongest language he could command. He urged gentlemen not to forget
